

CEO GIRL AI

The Ideal Customer AI Profile Kit

Step 3 of 6: Marketing to "everyone" is why no one buys.
Get precise on exactly who this is for, and your words start doing the selling for you.

"Speak to one woman clearly, and a thousand like her will hear you."

CEO GIRL AI

WELCOME

Why Specificity Sells

Read this first

Vague marketing gets vague results. "For anyone who wants to grow their business" gets scrolled past. "For the freelance graphic designer who's great at the work but dreads pricing conversations" gets a screenshot sent to a friend, because it sounds like someone was actually listening. This kit builds that level of precision — using both what you already know about your audience and AI to sharpen it further.

By the end, you'll have:

- ☐ A real, specific ideal customer profile — not a demographic sheet
- ☐ Her actual pain points and desires, in her own likely words
- ☐ The objections and hesitations she'll have before buying
- ☐ A translation guide from her language into your marketing copy

Start With Who You Already Know

Real people beat imaginary personas

Before inventing a customer avatar from scratch, look at who's already around you. Past clients, people who've asked about what you do, people in your DMs, people you'd love to work with even if they haven't paid you yet.

Name or description	What they struggle with	Why they'd be a great fit

The Common Thread

Looking at the people above, what do they have in common — beyond demographics? A mindset, a stage of business, a specific frustration?

Building the Full Profile

Beyond age and location — into how she actually thinks

Category	Her details
Life/business stage
What she wants most right now
What she's afraid will happen if nothing changes
What she's already tried that didn't work
Where she spends time online
What kind of voice/tone she trusts (direct? warm? no-nonsense?)

AI-Assisted Customer Research

Use AI to stress-test and deepen the profile you just built

"Here's my ideal customer profile: [paste Part 2]. Ask me questions that would help make this more specific and less generic — push me to get concrete instead of settling for broad strokes."

"Based on this customer profile: [paste it], what are 5 things she's likely searching for online right now related to her problem? Write them as if she typed them herself."

"What are 3 objections this specific person would have to buying [describe your offer], based on her stage and mindset? Be specific to her, not generic to the industry."

What Surfaced

Her Words, Not Yours

The best marketing copy is copied almost directly from how she talks

Marketing that sounds like a business talking to a customer feels like an ad. Marketing that sounds like it was lifted from her own group chat feels like it was written for her specifically — because it was.

What she'd actually say about her problem	How you'd usually phrase it (jargon-y)

Where to Find Her Real Words

- ☐ Comments and reviews on similar products or services
- ☐ Questions people ask in forums or groups related to her problem
- ☐ Actual messages past clients or customers have sent you
- ☐ Her likely search queries, written exactly how she'd type them

Your Messaging Cheat Sheet

One page to reference every time you write a caption, email, or sales page

She struggles with
She wants
She's hesitant because Your offer answers this by

CUSTOMER CLARITY

You Know Exactly Who You're Talking To

Every caption, DM, and sales page just got easier to write. Next: make sure the price matches what she's actually willing to pay.

Continue to Step 4: The Digital Product Pricing Calculator + Guide.