The 30-Day Business Launch System

Step 5 of 6: Everything you've built so far becomes real this month — build, warm up, launch, and follow through.

"Done and imperfect beats perfect and unlaunched, every time."

WELCOME

Your Launch Month, Mapped

Read this first

By now you have a validated idea, a built offer, a clear customer, and a real price. This is where it stops being theoretical. The next 30 days are split into four weeks: build the last pieces, warm up an audience, launch publicly, and follow through afterward — because what happens after launch week determines whether this becomes a business or a one-time event.

The Four Weeks:

- ☐ Week 1 — Build: finish the offer, the delivery, and a simple sales page
- ☐ Week 2 — Warm-Up: build anticipation before you ask anyone to buy
- ☐ Week 3 — Launch Week: a day-by-day sequence to actually sell it
- ☐ Week 4 — Follow-Through: deliver well, collect feedback, plan what's next

Build

Days 1–7 · Finish the last 20%

Task	Done
Finalize the actual deliverable (workbook, templates, course content, etc.)
Write a simple sales page or product description (doesn't need to be fancy)
Set up how people will actually pay you
Set up how the product gets delivered after purchase
Do one full test run yourself, start to finish

The 80% Rule

Perfectionism is the most socially acceptable form of procrastination. If the core deliverable solves the problem and works, launch it — you can improve it after real customers give you real feedback.

Warm-Up

Days 8–14 · Build anticipation before you sell

Nobody buys from someone who shows up once to ask for money. This week is about being visible and useful before the ask — so by launch week, people already know what's coming.

Day	Warm-up action	Done
8	Share the problem your offer solves — no pitch yet
9	Share your own story of solving this problem
10	Tease that something's coming, without full details
11	Answer a question your ideal customer would actually ask
12	Share a quick win or preview from the offer itself
13	Open a waitlist or DM list for early access
14	Announce the launch date directly

Launch Week

Days 15–21 · The actual ask

Day	Launch action	Done
15	Doors open — announce clearly, with the price and the link
16	Share a testimonial or result from your soft-launch group (Step 2)
17	Address the top objection directly and publicly
18	Share behind-the-scenes of what's inside
19	Remind people of the deadline or bonus expiring
20	Last call — direct, no apologizing for asking
21	Doors close. Thank everyone who bought, publicly.

AI companion prompt: "I'm launching [offer name] at [price] this week. Help me write a direct, non-pushy 'doors are open' announcement that leads with the transformation, not just the features."

Follow-Through

Days 22–30 · What happens after the launch high wears off

Task	Done
Deliver the offer well — check in with buyers, don't just send and disappear
Ask for feedback while the experience is fresh Collect a testimonial from at least one happy buyer
Note what worked in the launch and what you'd change next time
Decide: re-open later, keep it open on evergreen, or fold learnings into a v2

Launch Debrief

What surprised you? What would you do differently? What's one thing you're proud of, regardless of the numbers?

If the Launch Underperforms

A quiet launch is data, not a verdict on you

What happened	Likely cause	What to check next
Lots of interest, no sales	Price, trust, or timing issue	Revisit Step 4 pricing and objections in Step 2
Little interest at all	Audience or offer-market mismatch	Revisit Step 3 — is this really who you warmed up?
Sales, but lukewarm feedback	Delivery gap between promise and product	Revisit the transformation promise in Step 2

LAUNCHED

You Actually Did It

Most people never get past the idea stage. You have a real offer, real customers, and real proof you can sell. Next: build the marketing rhythm that keeps this going.
